ESS Provides Accredited Training for NJ-ALPHI Home Inspectors

Jim Melesky, President of ESS Energy Products, provided the latest accredited training session for ALPHI Home Inspectors in New Jersey. The session provided detailed information regarding the scope, cost and other ramifications of the energy loss through the attic entrance of residential homes. "It is the most overlooked source of energy loss in nearly every home today," said Mr. Melesky. He went on, "It is costly in terms of wasted heating and cooling expenses and it typically makes a 3 degree or more difference in the room or even floor of a home in both winter and summer. It is also a major reason for the use of space heaters."

"Buyers rely on us to check out everything before they move into their new home. We need to be aware of each item that can benefit the homeowner," began Joseph Wehrhahn, President of NJ ALPHI. He continued, "Virtually no one understood the magnitude and cost of energy loss through the attic until the latest training session by ESS. This is a great example of how our ongoing education program benefits our members and their clients."

"I was very pleased with the level of interest from the attendees," commented Jim Melesky, President of ESS Energy Products, Inc. He went on to say, "In this one session, they learned the details of this problem and the standards to properly resolve it. These home inspectors can now inform homeowners of this important matter that most are not aware of today."

Space heaters are an expensive option for heating. In addition, The Nation Fire Protection Association reported that more than 8,000 thermal burns, 19,000 injuries treated at hospital emergency rooms, nearly 200 deaths and more than $250 million were attributed to space heaters in one year.

"This is an essential item for any home inspector to check and pay careful attention to in every home. The fact that proper remediation of the attic entrance is also an important fire safety measure is also extremely important. Ultimately, homeowners will greatly benefit from this session," concludes Mr. Wehrhahn.
